Residual Valuation

A residual method of valuation is likely to be applied by the Valuer for properties that have planning permission/change of use consent in place or where a property is due to undergo significant refurbishment works. Typical scenarios whereby a residual method of valuation would be used are as follows (the following list is not exhaustive):

- A commercial property with consent in place to be converted into residential accommodation.
- A single residential property with consent in place to be converted into multiple residential units.
- A single residential property currently in uninhabitable condition but due to undergo heavy refurbishment works.

For heavy refurbishment projects, we will be guided by the valuer as to whether a vacant possession or residual valuation is most appropriate.

The published maximum product LTVs will be considered for assets with good demand in their current use. Where there is limited demand for the property in its current configuration lending will be subject to a maximum 60% LTV.
